.Social Trust on the Rise for Post-College Why does trust in the "system" run so high among the young? As a generation of technology “savvy,” they are more skeptical of institutions and the established order. Matthew Nyhof is finding that people who didn't go to college are now confident they will get their jobs back. Matthew Nyhof has two graduate degrees, including a Ph.D. in social psychology. After growing up in a family where they “knew people who made their way in the world,” Nyhof’s mother didn’t want him to go to college. “She felt like it wouldn’t have been helpful to my long-term career prospects,” he says. He is now an assistant professor at Ohio State University, where he studies social psychology and social neuroscience, particularly related to optimism and pessimism. “When I was a graduate student, I spent a lot of time in the library,” he says. “A lot of questions have been rolling through my head ever since.” Why does trust in the “system” run so high among the young? As a generation of technology “savvy,” they are more skeptical of institutions and the established order. “If you want to change the world,” Nyhof says, “you need to start by acknowledging that the world exists and change it from the bottom up.” Still, that doesn’t mean his own young adult life has been without its challenges. He has had to overcome stereotype-shattering experiences that made him feel discriminated against. Then he started working at a university to save money—and was shocked to discover that the people in the office seemed to assume that his family didn’t have money. When he asked his mother how she had gotten through college without her family’s help, she told him they had considered it a “responsibility” to take care of each other. Today, Nyhof is finding that people who didn’t go to college are now confident they will get their jobs back. “People who grew up in poverty find it easier to believe that they’re going to get their jobs back,” he says. “What you’re seeing is a shift. People growing up are more confident in the idea that c6a93da74d
