Q: Storing videos in iPhone How do you develop applications where a user can access the camera and can record a video. How do you go about it? Do you write an application in Objective-C or C? My current understanding is that you will have to do everything in C; for example, if you want the user to press a button and have a video saved. My guess is that you start off with a C app that calls up a UIView that covers the entire screen and has some sort of button at the bottom to make it record. The problem with this approach is it seems like it would be harder to code, as you'd need to make something that mimics a user interface that would allow this. Any advice would be helpful. A: You can start with your C app and then write an Objective-C wrapper around it. A: The best way to do it is Cocoa Touch. Apple has an extensive library of UI and video controls you can use. Take a look at the UIKit sample code, they handle the video stuff in that. If you want to do it yourself, that will be a lot of work. You'd have to learn how to write UIKit which might be a lot to take on, or you could look at a framework that already does it, like the Codea iPad framework. Q: Efficient way to use external library c++ library in more than one cpp file I am using a library called HMUGi, a full featured Music Visualizer API on my win32 project. Now I am developing another c++ project, that has some classes that are used by my main class but I also want to use this library's api for a purpose independent of the main project. I am using a makefile and header guards, but somehow i am experiencing problems. For example, I have to define HMUGI_EXPORTS because the header files include a complex big header, and it includes HMUGI_EXPORTS. It is a little logical to include the library's header after the library source for my purposes, but that means that if i want to use the library I have to define HMUGI_EXPORTS once again. Is there any way to avoid the "double defining"? A: the easiest way is to write a dummy main function in your current project int main

Post navigation DCF does not go deep into investigation of attempted homicide – for families of young man it seemed Dr. Yeager wasn't up to the task May 14, 2014 11:30PM MADISON – After an attempt was made on the life of an African-American teen from Greenfield and her mother, Wednesday, May 14, an all-white jury in Dane County Circuit Court, in which they ultimately found her not guilty of attempted second-degree murder, heard a small retinue of reporters follow Dr. Sadiye Yeager, the victim's toxicologist, and family members to the train station in Kenosha to complete a few details. What no one followed was the DCF investigation into the attempted homicide of 19-year-old Keeshia Nelson, whose 17-year-old sister claimed when she was shot in the back of the head and arm in Madison that she opened the door to allow the assailants in but, as she thought, they forced themselves in. The 18-year-old brother of Nelson's sister who was present that night, when Nelson was shot, and who previously cut his hand in an attempt to escape, will not be prosecuted for his role in the attempted murder. Keeshia Nelson and her mother Le'Niya also know what the case is all about. In 2002, the Nelsons, both black, were in Greenfield where Keeshia Nelson, the eldest of four children and star point guard on her high school basketball team, was in fifth grade and the mother, Le'Niya, worked at Lone Star Gas. One night Keeshia was outside with her friend Megan and "some boys," according to a search warrant, when they were approached by a teen. The boy then shot Megan in the face, killing her instantly. The boy then shot Keeshia multiple times, first in the leg, then in the foot, then in the leg again, then in the hip and finally in the head and arm. Le'Niya had spotted her daughter's assailants as they drove by, pulled over, and gave Megan CPR, but paramedics arrived to find she had been fatally shot, and Keeshia was critically injured. Yeager was the toxicologist for the state. What she determined in her trial was that the poison used was melamine, and Le'N
