In a typical network, three different types of computer systems or applications may access network resources. These may include client and server computers that run one or more user applications. They may also include network access points such as routers and switches for communication with one or more server computers, and finally they may include network security devices for monitoring access to network resources and checking for computer viruses. Since these devices communicate with one another, they may have to exchange configuration and control information during initialization. In an effort to increase the efficiency of data processing systems, operating systems and software are increasingly distributed and made available to multiple users and/or groups of users. To this end, the software component on any given computer may be designed for use by multiple users. Additionally, multiple users may desire access to the same software component at the same time. For example, two different users may log into a computer system at the same time, and both may be desirous of logging onto a shared account. The operating system and software components should be configured to permit multiple users to access the same resources at the same time. This is not always the case, however, and the same user may attempt to access multiple resources during a single login. As these multiple requests are made, the operating system should identify the multiple requests as part of the initial configuration and permit some coordination between the resources that the multiple requests apply to. Similarly, multiple network devices within the same network may also share the same configuration and control information. In order to prevent the network devices from all becoming out of sync, it is desirable to maintain synchronization between the network devices. This may be difficult to accomplish, however, because as mentioned above, the network devices communicate with one another to exchange information. Accordingly, multiple mechanisms are used to exchange configuration and control information to prevent the loss of synchronization between the multiple devices. The exchange of control and
