Radiation is considered as a potential cancer risk-modifying agent. However, little is known about the relative usefulness of different doses of the same ionizing radiation. To understand the mechanisms of action, it is necessary to know the effects of different irradiation doses on the expression of DNA damage response genes, apoptosis pathways, and tumor suppressor genes in cultured mammalian cells, as well as, the radiation-induced genomic instability and carcinogenesis in animal models and humans. We developed a system to measure and analyze the dose-response relationships for changes in the expression of 43 radiation-responsive genes of interest in B6C3F1 mice and in cultured NIH-3T3 cells. We obtained the radiation dose-response curves for these genes, which revealed very high sensitivity of these genes to radiation at doses of as low as 2.3 mGy. However, we also found that the majority of these genes did not respond to radiation doses below about 0.5 Gy. The expression of several genes, such as Nqo1, Gpx2, Aifm1, Xrcc2, and Ccbp2, were capable of distinguishing radiation doses below 5 mGy. In general, we found that the kinetics of gene expression was slower than the kinetics of cell survival and/or apoptosis induction in irradiated B6C3F1 mice. In human normal diploid fibroblasts, the expression of these genes was also dose-responsive to radiation in a manner similar to that of B6C3F1 mice. The findings in these studies support the concept that the dose-response of these genes can be used to assess the potential of radiation as a human cancer risk-modifying agent. 09e8f5149f
