Donald Trump's allegation that Barack Obama wiretapped his phones at Trump Tower is the latest remarkable example of a president's peddling a non-existent conspiracy theory. But as New York University law professor Michael Segalov wrote in a provocative essay for The Weekly Standard, Obama's wiretapping accusation is an interesting counterpoint to another non-starter that President Trump has tossed around in recent months: Obama's role in the "Muslim ban" targeting people from a number of Muslim-majority countries, like Syria and Yemen. Obama's response to President Trump's Muslim ban is instructive for understanding how unlikely it is that Trump will ever be able to put his administration on a stable path. "If I had a son, he would look like Donald Trump," Obama told an audience in Saudi Arabia last summer. As president, he didn't appoint a single Republican official to his administration. Trump is apparently determined to continue Obama's hard line against Iran — a bellicose stance that has led to the current crisis between the two countries. But as Segalov points out, Obama "was widely expected to take a harder line on Iran than Bush." Considering the numerous intelligence reports about Iran's nuclear program, the Obama administration took great pains to ensure that any new sanctions against Iran were fully blocked by the U.N. Security Council. Trump hasn't been nearly as aggressive in applying sanctions to Iran, and has backed away from U.N. sanctions altogether. His administration has opened a back channel to Iran — signaling that they're willing to speak to the country in hopes of resolving this crisis. But Trump has ignored Obama's warnings on Iran as well. And in a sick irony, the new Republican president is now claiming, not unlike Trump Tower, that he's been wiretapped by the Obama administration. This bizarre analogy is possible because both Trump's ban on travelers from the countries affected by the U.N. sanctions and his wiretapping accusations can be traced back to a 35-page, 2011-era report on jihad. That report, which was written by a panel of intelligence officials, was based on classified information, but it's now widely available. It concluded that jihadists are plotting to do "acts of war" against the U.S. and that there is a "widespread" effort among j

Unraveling long-term soil-plant interactions: understanding the genetics of plant-herbivore interactions. Soil-plant interactions are important drivers of plant community ecology and evolution. They are determined by interactions between plants and microorganisms in the soil, mediated by the plants' root system and by the standing crop of mycorrhizal fungi that are associated with the roots. Different types of plant roots and root morphological and physiological traits, ranging from root-sensing to the exudation of the antimicrobial siderophore 2,4-dihydroxy-7-methoxy-1,4-benzoxazin-3-one (DIMBOA), have evolved to make plants more competitive and less susceptible to attack by root herbivores. These root traits influence the species composition, diversity, and temporal dynamics of the belowground plant community. Herbivore-induced plant traits that select for higher resistance or tolerance towards the herbivore, including allelochemicals, terpenoids, polyphenolics, and physical defense mechanisms, such as thicker cell walls and increased cell membrane permeability, often enhance the abundance of less competitive, and usually asymbiotic, microorganisms in the rhizosphere. These bacteria and fungi, in turn, are associated with enhanced plant fitness, including higher growth rate, biomass, flowering time, reproduction, and survival. The long-term outcomes of these interactions, with regard to plant distribution and evolutionary trajectories, are determined by interactions between the phenotypes of plants and their associated microorganisms and, thereby, are mediated by plant genotype. The evolution of plant resistance and tolerance towards herbivores, in turn, is the outcome of a trade-off between the costs to the plant associated with the production of allelochemicals or terpenoids and the costs to the microorganisms associated with the production of antibiotics or siderophores. Hence, it is the state of the genotype of both plants and their associated microorganisms that determines their genotype plasticity towards the long-term outcome of plant-herbivore interactions. The genetic basis of these microbe-plant interactions is the subject of increasing research interest. Here, we discuss the current state of knowledge and future challenges that lie ahead.Ab initio study of the Re/Ni system. I.
