Driven Couplings Couplings provide a good seal for the liquid flow with a minimum of friction and introduce no additional resistance to flow. with no additional pressure loss for the pump. 4 Figure CG-2.1.2 Typical Pressure Loss due to Coupling Loss, r Couplings offer both resistance to flow and a good seal. 4 A. Fluid couplings are generally driven by an external mechanism such as a hand or pneumatic tool. 4 A. In a manual coupling, a drive nut is screwed onto a thread on the coupling's hub, and the hub is screwed onto the coupling's spigot. A. Hand-operated couplings fall into four groups: (a) screw-on screw-off or standard hand-couplings, (b) 4 4 22 2 screw-on quick-disconnect couplings with swivel capability, (c) internal shaft or external shaft manual connections, and (d) external shafts with screw-on hand connections. The advantages of a standard screw-on and screw-off coupling (group a) are well known -- the coupling can be easily connected and disconnected, and the volume of fluid to be discarded is minimized. On the other hand, this type of coupling suffers from two problems. First, because the connections are often made by the distributor or meter, the couplings can and do become misaligned, resulting in leakage. Second, with a standard coupling there is no positive lock of the coupling. Couplings with a positive lock will not leak if the coupling is misaligned. Another type of coupling is the quick-disconnect (SCOD) coupling (group b). These are excellent couplings, and the ease with which they 570a42141b
