VOD Viewer Description: Road bike position Give your bike that one small thing that makes your riding difference. A good position. To make the most out of your position, follow a few simple and consistent rules, if you want your riding to feel good. Before you begin First, it helps to think of the road bike position as “an investment” rather than “a hobby” – you’re trying to achieve a better position. Before you begin to ride, take 5-10 minutes to reset your mind and body by looking into the horizon and feeling the roads through your heels. Take a moment to focus on your posture – bend your knees, lift your torso up, push your upper body back into the saddle. Switch your head, eyes and hands, moving your left hand to the inside of the handlebar, left elbow at the top of the handlebar, and left shoulder level with your right shoulder. When you go to ride, remember to re-focus. Riding Position In all cases, ride with your hips higher than your knees. Bend your knees less than 30 degrees. Lean slightly forward, flex your hip, and pull your seat forward and back a bit. Ideally your torso is held in front of your handlebars – but not leaning back so far that it’s uncomfortable. How high your heels are is very important. If your heels reach your pedals, you’re in the “road bike” position – a good one. If your heels aren’t higher than your pedals, you’re in the “Hairless Chicken” position – not very good. Your head should be position directly above your handlebars, looking forward. Your hands should be at the 10 o’clock and 2 o’clock positions on the bars, or slightly outside them. You should be able to touch the frame easily through your palms. Your seat height should be about 7-8 inches from the bottom of your seat to the ground. Bike position variations
