To begin, it's important to note that for this tutorial you'll need an old computer.. I just burned the irq_free_list_insert method. You can download this from here. More information on the hardware setup can be found here. Otherwise, change the driver.Q: How can I wait until all threads are finished before performing another task in.NET? I am writing a batch script that will run a number of PowerShell.NET scripts (all in a batch script). Some of the PowerShell scripts make connections to 3rd party APIs. If a connection fails or times out, the.NET code will have to retry a number of times (setTimeout). This pattern of execution is a bit like a p-iteration style schedule. Currently, I have a job that sends off a synchronous, blocking request to each of the scripts. This is a fairly slow operation, so I was wondering if there was a way to serialize the scripts so that I can have the job send off the request to the first script, then wait until the script is done before sending the request to the next script, etc. However, I also want to avoid having the scheduler wait infinitely. Can someone recommend an approach that would best accomplish this? Here is my current batch script that will execute all the PowerShell scripts: @Echo OFF SetLocal EnableDelayedExpansion CALL:Scripts :Scripts IF "%~1"=="" Goto Done SET WORKDIR=%~1 "%~f1" "%~f1" Goto Scripts :Done EndLocal A: This method uses BackgroundWorker and all 5 approaches seem to work: The BackgroundWorker control provides simple, standard ways for threads to interact with the.NET Framework while the app is in foreground. In your case, the easiest way would probably be the DoWork event handler, in order to invoke a method that will be called in the background thread. Your DoWork could be something like this: public void bw_DoWork(object sender, DoWorkEventArgs e) { //Send request to start the scripts execution BackgroundWorker bw = sender as BackgroundWorker; bw.RunWorkerAsync();
