The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for measuring the mass of particulates entrained in a gaseous medium, and more particularly to a method and apparatus for measuring the mass of particulates entrained in exhaust gases from a diesel engine. It is of paramount importance to be able to accurately measure particulate emissions from internal combustion engines, especially from diesel engines. It is of critical importance to know the amount of particulate emissions in order to be able to take any action which will minimize the amount of particulates emitted from the engine. Also, for the purpose of emission standards as well as monitoring of emission control processes, it is vital to know the amount of particulate emissions in the exhaust gases. Various methods and devices have been developed for measuring particulate emissions. Measurements have been made of particulate emissions by weighing the accumulated material in filters or by measuring the electric conductivity of the accumulated material. More recently, optical systems and scanners have been developed to detect accumulated particulate in filters or the tail pipe. In the present invention an on-line particulate emissions monitor is provided in which particulate emissions from an engine are detected using an ultraviolet-visible optical absorption technique and the mass of particulates is determined. Such a system is disclosed in U.S. patent application Ser. No. 07/283,281, filed Nov. 15, 1988, now U.S. Pat. No. 4,945,644, assigned to the assignee of the present application, which is incorporated herein by reference for all purposes. Other methods and devices for measuring particulate emissions are disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,751,615; 4,838,760; 4,901,508; and 4,943,103. U.S. Pat. No. 4,838,760 discloses a method and device for detecting very low levels of particulates in exhaust gases, which comprises burning a sample of the exhaust gases in a catalyst bed containing a
