Chris Fiore, senior insurance expert with the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, says auto insurance companies are increasingly looking to cover the costs of conservation practices in the event of a claim. "Conservation easements are, by definition, preventive measures, so the insurance companies are looking to cover these costs as well," Fiore says. Insurance companies can offer consumers "an early warning for the first two years so that people can be proactive in repairing or replacing things." That's why the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety recently sponsored a roundtable discussion, "The First Two Years of the 2007 Insurance Reform Law: Provisions and Implications," in Kansas City, Mo. (July 10-11). Speakers representing the insurance industry, consumer groups and auto safety organizations addressed these new opportunities. The main provision of the auto insurance reform legislation, Part One, is the Insurance Reliability and Availability Act, which is called IRAA (2007). Originally proposed by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration in January 2005, IRAA had greater significance for the insurance industry and consumers. In 2005, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration
