Don't make the mistake of hoping your personal stock portfolio will take care of itself over time, a new study warns. Even when money is being invested prudently, a portfolio that makes money for a decade or two will likely have more bad years during that period than good ones. The study, which appears in the journal Risk, suggests that finding a top stock pick in 2014 should be a priority. "There is no magic formula for investment success," said Amos Schweitzer, a former academic finance professor who is now chief executive of Schweitzer Asset Management, which allocates cash and low-cost bonds. "But there is a lesson to learn from history." A reasonable conclusion from this study is that investors in an overall stock market should look to diversify broadly. The vast majority of active fund investors did so last year, showing up in banks, utilities, retailers, consumer staples, energy and health care. But investors in any particular stock should look for opportunities to diversify, said Mark Luschni, chief investment strategist at Janney Montgomery Scott. "Active managers tend to have higher-rated names than the market as a whole," Mr. Luschni said. "My sense is that the top stocks are the ones that are undervalued, either because they've been neglected or because there is a lot of concern about a slowdown." One of those stocks is retailer Saks Inc., which is a member of the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. As other retailers have been hurt by a slowdown in China, Saks has been doing well. "China is the biggest story of the year," said Scott Schuh, a portfolio manager with Gabelli Funds. " 3e33713323
