A modern system for aero-space and ground-based cargo re-supply. This paper describes the development of a generalised cargo re-supply system for both space and ground based payloads. The system provides a supply and recovery capability for a payload, whether fixed in orbit or carried in a launch vehicle. The system is designed to be integrated into a launch vehicle such as a Delta-II, and is used to transfer items of cargo from the lander to the vehicle, and then from the vehicle to the payload. Specific examples of the type of payload that the system is designed to provide re-supply capability for are discussed. Reduction of lymphocyte immunosuppressive factor and/or inhibition of its production by glucocorticoid treatment in tumor-bearing rats. Thymocyte and lymph node cells (LNC) from normal rats suppress the activity of phytohemagglutinin (PHA)-induced lymphocyte cultures from syngeneic tumor-bearing rats (TBRS) by about 25 to 50%. This phenomenon of anergy, termed immune suppression, can be induced by LNC from TBRS, thymus, or spleen. LNC contain a lymphokine, termed immunosuppressive factor (ISF), that can be inactivated by acid treatment. The ISF, in turn, stimulates LNC and thymus cells to produce an agent that is also capable of suppressing PHA-induced lymphocyte culture activity. The degree of PHA-induced suppressor factor activity (PISA) or lymphocyte conversion factor activity (LCF) production by LNC from TBRS is approximately 1 to 2 orders of magnitude greater than that induced by LNC or thymus cells in normal rats. Pretreatment of TBRS with dexamethasone (DEX) has been reported to reduce the PISA-to-LCF ratio by about fivefold. We have examined the relative efficiency of DEX-treatment at reducing lymphocyte immunosuppressive activity in TBRS to that in normal rats. DEX treatment did not alter suppressor activity in normal rats but reduced the ratio of the PISA-to-LCF by about 90% in TBRS. This was true whether the PISA was taken from the thymus of TBRS or from TBRS themselves. The actual reduction in the PISA-to-LCF ratio was similar whether DEX was administered before or after PHA stimulation. These data
