Targeted therapy in non-small-cell lung cancer. After 25 years of research into pulmonary malignancy, the identification of novel molecular mechanisms involved in the pathogenesis of non-small-cell lung cancer (NSCLC) has transformed targeted therapy. With the advent of molecularly targeted therapies, the treatment landscape of NSCLC has shifted dramatically since the completion of the Phase III studies reported in this edition of Lung Cancer. Notably, the combination of erlotinib with platinum-based chemotherapy represents the first phase III study to demonstrate an increase in survival in patients with advanced disease. Phase III trials have also demonstrated the efficacy of drugs targeting the phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase (PI3K)/protein kinase B (Akt) and the mitogen-activated protein kinase (MAPK) signalling pathways in NSCLC.
