), the first major war of resistance to Dutch colonialism. From that time, only drawings have come down to us, but not photographic reproductions, since the locals did not allow photographing, and it was forbidden to publish photographs without their permission. The Mustaine family sought to be unnoticed: they avoided portraits and large photographs, and also demanded that their faces be hidden from prying eyes. The traditional costumes of the Dutch colonialists, unlike the clothes of the Indians, had only a deep neckline covered in the lining, decorated in front with carved music and dance motifs. In 1889, at the 16th World Exhibition in Paris, a photograph of a female head was presented, which was considered a portrait of the work of Thomas Wood Mustaine. The price of the photo is 10 thousand francs. The photograph was criticized, including by feminists. In France, the portrait was considered an insult. The Dutch royal house protested and demanded an apology. After that, the portrait seems to have been under restoration for a long time. And in 1969, two years before his death, at the age of 89, Thomas Wood Mustajen died. He bequeathed to be buried in the same grave with the portrait and next to the portraits of his children and grandchildren, but at the same time he refused the title of "Father and Teacher of the Portrait Painters of America." There is another version: the image was taken away to protect it from persecution by the authorities. Unfortunately, we don't know what really happened to him. Art historians believe he may have been paid that kind of money not to show it. a source Well, it's really beautiful...
