Table of contentsModern communication and recording technology utilize more sophisticated means of information transfer and storage than was available just a generation or two ago. Digital data transfer and storage now have supplanted analog means for many applications. For example, modern magnetic storage means such as hard disk drives can store gigabytes of digital data for relatively little cost, while also facilitating rapid access to the stored data. Similarly, digital video and audio recording systems are now commonplace, and digital wireless communication systems such as cellular telephones and digital pagers can transmit and receive voice and data information in short bursts, facilitating the transfer of substantial amounts of information over long distances in a short period of time. A number of other modern applications take advantage of digital data transfer and storage means in similar fashion. However, the demand for reliable, high-quality, long-distance communication and storage systems, especially those that can operate over great distances and under conditions where the communication medium or information channel is severely degraded, continues to grow. It is well known that digital transmission over existing telephone networks is possible using methods such as Time-Division Multiplexing (TDM) and its variants, as well as newer methods such as Code-Division Multiplexing (CDM), which are described in greater detail in U.S. Pat. No. 6,144,468, U.S. Pat. No. 6,167,229, and U.S. Pat. No. 6,178,002, all of which are assigned to the assignee of the present invention, the disclosures of which are incorporated by reference herein in their entirety. There is a need for methods and systems for digital wireless communication systems that utilize both TDM and CDM methods, as well as other CDM methods, to improve upon current TDM-based wireless communication systems and standards.Hong Kong police fired tear gas at about 1,100 pro-democracy protesters on Monday, the first major use of force in recent months as a tense
