The article makes good points, and the program looks interesting. I would suggest that a proper uninstallation program should make a record of the apps which are removed or updated, and it should also make a backup of the system files. I have read the article, and it seems that the installer should be able to do this. However, I do not have any experience with the uninstaller, so I would not be able to tell you if it does. And yes, a record of the programs which are uninstalled would definitely be very useful, as far as the user is concerned. You may have a point. I have a very small budget, so I have to use Windows 10 for free. This is why I have no experience with the uninstallation program. I do not think that the author is aware of this, otherwise, this might have been made clear in the article. If it is not available, there is another method which could be implemented as well. It would involve the use of a very simple Windows 10 application called "App Advisor". You can download it here: The download package includes an uninstaller, as well as a version of App Advisor. I have no experience with this particular application, so I can't say if it does the same as the author's app. After reading the article, and looking at the comments, I would like to make a couple of observations. First of all, some of the programs which are mentioned are indeed pre-installed, whereas others are default apps, like the date and time, and the taskbar. And of course, there are a few other applications included here which are not necessarily pre-installed, like "OneDrive", "Music", "Xbox", and others. Second, the install program should be able to uninstall the pre-installed apps, as well as the default ones. This is an extremely useful feature, since we might be using Windows 10 for free, but we have not even the slightest clue of what is pre-
