Efficient extraction of phenolics from hulled barley flour for food applications. The objective of this study was to develop efficient extraction techniques to obtain high-quality phenolic fractions from hulled barley flour using mild extraction conditions. Methods were evaluated on the basis of their ability to obtain phenolics that could be used in food products. The following parameters were evaluated: the extraction medium, the extraction time and the extraction temperature. The best extraction conditions were obtained with n-hexane at 60 degrees C for 24 h. An 80% extraction yield was obtained using this method and the resulting extract was used for the determination of the main phenolic compounds. HPLC analysis indicated that the extract was characterized by a content of hydroxycinnamic acids (18.28 mg of caffeic acid/g of hulled barley flour), flavonoids (21.87 mg of quercetin/g of hulled barley flour) and proanthocyanidins (46.10 mg of catechin/g of hulled barley flour). The extracts were also characterized by a high antioxidant activity, assayed by the DPPH method, resulting in an IC(50) value of 4.06 microg/ml, and by a high ferric reducing capacity (EC(50) = 0.40 mM), indicating the presence of redox-active compounds.
