Description: Toyota Navigation software is primarily a navigation program designed to allow you to navigate from point to point in the same way as a traditional automotive navigation system. The program allows you to plan a route, set the destination of the route, take off, then return to the destination. It can also allow you to connect to OpenStreetMap. You can also use voice dictation to type in the location. The program uses the simplest of methods to actually "send" you to your destination. It uses an external GPS to determine the location and it starts at the location you entered when you want to start navigation. It tracks your position through the GPS receiver in the navigation system but it does not use the four other GPS satellites that would allow you to determine your exact position on the map. The home button is the usual tab for the on-screen display (OSD). When you are driving, the GPS status is updated to show where you are and on the map. The low battery warning is provided in case the batteries have died or run out. The backup program can restore an entire map or only the last point which was visited. There is no longer an extensive menu. Instead, you can turn the system on and off. You can access the basic functions and such by clicking on the bar and then on the menu. It requires the map information to be stored on a USB stick or a CD or DVD.
