Note When you create a new image, or any new Photoshop document, the background is white by default. The only way to change this is to open the Preference dialog box, click Raster & Vector and, under Background Color, click the Use Defaults button. ## Creating a new image As stated earlier in this chapter, the initial view of the newly created Photoshop document is generally white (because the background color is white by default). This means that the first step you'll take in Photoshop is to change the background color to what you want to use. Select the Background tab on the menu bar. In the sample image below, a few different choices are shown: Color even; none; and Gradient. To add a background, go to Layer > New (Figure 2-4). In Figure 2-4, you can see that a white background is selected, and the option is grayed out. We'll click OK. Figure 2-4. Pick your background and then click OK. The last one shown below, "Layer 1, Color even," is a result of using a single solid color for the background and the gradient overlaid on top of it. In the next part of this exercise, we'll be working in the Layers panel. A _layer_ is an area of your canvas, such as the sky or the flower garden

You can either do a solid color, a gradient (pastel gradient from one color to another), or a pattern. If you want a gradient, make sure your software allows you to create a gradient from one color to another color. For example, go from dark to light. If you want a pattern, you'll need a free image that goes with that pattern. Free wallpaper images for an example of a pattern can be found HERE. Open your photo and click on Select > From Photo or just click on the photo to start applying the pattern. Click on Choose. To add a pattern, you can use the Pattern Fill tool (found in the Edit menu) or the Pattern Stamp tool (also found in the Edit menu). To add a pattern, click on the photo. This will turn the photo white and select the photo. Click on the pattern tab on the top menu bar. This will bring up the pattern option. If you see the Expand button, click it. This will make a box around the pattern. Click inside of the box and hold down the Alt key. This will make the picture become white. This will help you see the pattern. Thursday, December 9, 2010 Icebunny (2010) Icebunny, which premiered at the 2010 SXSW Film Festival, was shot at both the Detroit and San Francisco area. We welcome the opportunity to spotlight the new film, directed by longtime photographer/filmmaker Katherine Long, and describe why she considers it an important work. Long's first feature documentary introduces her husband (and co-filmmaker) Blake Long, and their co-parenting of their four children. When she was pregnant with the first of her four children, Long had a job as a project manager at a major bank in Northern California. After a major promotion, she was transferred to the Detroit area, working at a different bank, when she realized that she had inadvertently signed a purchase order for a freezer-mounted camera. The first film in the series she has made about her children's childhoods, Icebunny explores questions about family life, parenting, politics, and celebrity culture. It concerns the events leading up to the American financial meltdown of 2008. That year, Long's husband was laid off from his job. Like many other couples, they began to battle over how to support their family, which led to their divorce and Long returning to the area from which she had left. "It was really this sense of rising up in slow motion out of this sort of humdrum suburban childhood, where they were the three best kids in school and they played stickball and played at the park and they rode bikes," Long explains. "It was this sense of leaving that life for all of us and reentering the adult world and having to reevaluate the role of parent. It is more than just about the job; it is about the institution of the family as well. As the crisis began, the consequences of your actions far exceed your sense of self." Filmmaker's Statement This is the third film in my family-centered documentary series, filmed in Detroit, where my family now lives, and San Francisco, where I grew up. The premise of the series is the way that my husband and I as parents became estranged from our own kids. The first film was When the Spoke Is Cut, which was shot in Detroit in 2008 while my husband, Blake Long, was laid off from his job. The second, Icebunny, was shot in Detroit in 2009. The film premiered at the 2010 SXSW Film Festival. With each film, I've
