I have followed the docs, but it seems that Databricks cannot resolve external libraries that are required by my Spark-code. First of all, in the Spark-view the spark script tag tells that Spark is not found.

{"dependencies": {}, "exports": {}, "module": {}, "noImplicitAny": false}

I have created a bin-dir to store the Spark-scripts. The path is declared in the spark

Why, if there are so many planets out there, are all the worlds so cold? Until now, that is. "Fifty years from now, if we find out that there's life out there, we will know that those aliens are much older than us," said Joshua Werk, author of "Tailoring Destiny: Your Interstellar Exploration," and an astronomer at the University of New South Wales in Sydney. "We'll know they've been out there for hundreds of millions of years, and we'll know that's because they've been cooling down," he added. The oldest exoplanet has been spotted so far is a planet called, appropriately enough, Kepler-186f. It's about 900 million miles away from the star Kepler-186, which is slightly older than the star our sun is now. The planet circles its star in a close distance, but that's where the similarity ends, because Kepler-186f is not as hot as our planet. In fact, it's the coldest known exoplanet. It's so cold that it's the type of planet we would expect to see in a much older universe. Kepler-186f's coldness was first measured by the Kepler Space telescope, which was tasked with finding planets in other star systems. Kepler is only sensitive to exoplanets that orbit their stars closer than 0.02 AU - about 33 million miles. Kepler's results show that Kepler-186f is so cold because it's likely made from rock and not gas. If the planet is made of hydrogen, it would be scorching hot. Kepler-186f's temperatures are comparable to what Jupiter is now. Jupiter's atmosphere is made up of up to 90 percent hydrogen and other gases. By contrast, Kepler-186f is made mostly of rock, with just about four percent by mass in gas. Rock is much harder than gas, Werk explained, and that explains why Kepler-186f is so cold. "You can't get as much heat out of rock as you can from gas," he explained. Kepler-186f is at least that old, based on its 0cc13bf012

Dishonest!" According to a report last week in The New York Times, U.S. intelligence officials reportedly presented Trump with evidence that Russia hacked Democrats during the 2016 election. Although the U.S. intelligence community has concluded that Russia meddled in the election, the report does not say whether Trump's campaign colluded with the Russian government. Last month, Trump's campaign manager, Kellyanne Conway, said during an interview on Fox News that the president would not get a "pass" if that were the case.
