Health hazards of domestic and occupational exposure to tropospheric ozone. 1. The health hazards of tropospheric ozone were studied in the laboratory with experimental animals, and in the field with human volunteers. 2. In controlled gas chambers, short-term exposure of rats and mice to high concentrations of ozone (0.22-1.47 mg/m<sup>3</sup>) produced pulmonary damage with pore-like lesions, alveolar edema and lung edema, cellular infiltration in the bronchoalveolar lining, and deposition of radiolabelled protein in the lungs. 3. Long-term exposure of mice to ozone concentration close to peak levels in ambient air (0.06-0.21 mg/m<sup>3</sup>) for periods of up to 4 months produced histological changes that were concentration dependent. 4. Rats exposed by inhalation to ozone were protected from the acute effects of high concentration exposures. 5. In healthy volunteers, ozone concentration of 0.1 mg/m<sup>3</sup> for 3 hours was well tolerated, and there was no significant change in lung function or in histological changes in the lungs. Ozone concentration of 0.15 mg/m<sup>3</sup> for 6 hours was well tolerated by patients with interstitial lung disease, but induced histological changes in
