The aim of this study was to determine what attributes of physicians are most important to women who are seeking or choosing a physician. In two studies, a total of 2,000 unmarried women, aged 15 to 45, and unmarried men, aged 18 to 45, were asked to rank the various attributes in their personal preference for a physician. The overall results demonstrated that women most frequently cited communication skills, empathy, and compassion as important, while men most frequently cited technical skills, competence, and a good appearance. No differences were found between groups in the order of importance of these attributes. Differences in how men and women rank the importance of these attributes emerged when the study population was subdivided into different age groups.Scientists have worked out exactly what is behind a mysterious surge of new bee sightings this year. In 2015, scientists spotted bees for the first time in two decades - a huge increase that puzzled researchers, and there are fears they
