What's new:

and the Departure of the Test Technician’s License For a long time I’ve wanted to write a column about the recent removal of my District 74 test technician’s license, when the last time I had it, I was fairly new to electrician work. I’ve always regarded certifications in the trade as a good thing, and the additional expenses incurred that are often quoted do seem to make sense, provided they are sensible. The last certificate was moved from the electrical trade into the mechanical trade because I was now doing a lot of ceramic work, which led to wanting a license to be able to supply them, simply because I knew that ceramic glazes and paints form the major part of the work I would be doing in that area. It wasn’t immediately seen as a logical move. Moving from one trade, to a very different type of work, doesn’t necessarily lower the value of the certificate in people’s minds. There’s a chain, and some people just won’t acknowledge that although certificates have value, moving from one to another will involve progression, at least in the minds of some people. Nothing was written saying that this path needed to be one where I became a mediocre ceramicist in a service industry which would see that as only faintly desirable. I had always been interested in ceramics and had been shown how to make simple salt and sugar glass. I’d watched an arborist and landscape designer clay-blasting molds to make fine garden planters and other objects and I didn’t consider myself any sort of entrepreneur, but these people seemed to have a passion for making craft and making things from clay. And then my wife, who happens to be a very creative artist, had a ceramic class, of one kind or another, about 10 years ago. She’d always liked painting, but decided to get it into her head that she liked it enough, along with the other ‘arts and crafts’ that she and I had been doing anyway, to ask for a class to start learning some ceramics. From that point, my first love and my second passion, and a passion that I still am today, was ceramic art. I didn’t need to be doing it professionally, but I love it, a whole lot, and started making and selling quick and slow fired seasonal designs, well before those holidays where I

Then sit back and enjoy. I'm gonna try as many before they freeze it. Forget 1ft all no matter what you do this game will never run 100% for you! Sorry I have spent so much time trying for 5 hours to get 100% and this game still won't run all the time even if I recheck it. It's a game that you'd think would be extremely simple to get it running but no. It's a shame. Another game I've tried to figure out how to get 100% on and that I got not running was The game called Ghost Practical Physics (don't ask me why that was spelled like practical phisics). I have played that game countless of times and couldn't get it running and I'm a physics professor at a university and I've played this game for hours. It's an AGESOME physics game that you can interact with because it's created by the developers. The story kind of sucks too as the game takes you through different scenarios to try to figure out how they happen and sometimes that just won't work. The physics engine in that game though works perfectly 100% of the
