What's new:

A robo-thorium is a dark, sterile habitat, used by certain lichens and fungi that lack phototrophs. A robo-thorium is often a location within the lichen or fungus that has an exceptionally high level of reactive oxygen species such as superoxide, hydroperoxy, and hydrogen peroxide, which causes oxidative damage to the fungus. The fungi then spends their time not photosynthesizing but oxidizing the substrates that they cannot use for energy. Unlike a true foliose lichen, a robo-thorium dwells on the upper side of a separate organism such as an lichen or fungus, usually after being extracted from the body of the host. Lichen robo-thoria Robo-thoria are relatively modern discoveries, so relatively little information is available about them. They were first found in 1990 on the omphalion of Hymenelia verschureuilii (Hymenelia serrata) lichens, and subsequently also in other species. The cause of these structures remains a mystery, and so does the general function of the robo-thoria. One possible explanation for their structure is that the growth of the lichen results in excessive water loss, resulting in a high concentration of reactive oxygen species. The hyperhydric zone is thus an environment without the usual protection mechanisms against oxidative stress. Lichens that lack mature robo-thoria (and thus synthesize a carotenoid pigment only in this zone) have been previously considered as lichenization mutants. Overall, there are about 30 robo-thoria species, all found in Hymenelia species. The evolutionary success of robo-thoria may be due to their evolutionary advantage, in the most relevant species, robo-thoria “protect” and “harvest” the omphalioid lichen, which would otherwise be unable to survive in the upper 5 cm of the rock surface. Lichen Robo-thoria protect the omphalion by producing photobacterial pigments. Phycobacteria such as cyanobacteria are found in several lichens throughout the world. It has been suggested that the photobacteria is used to scavenge molecular oxygen, yet this characteristic has only been observed in Hymenelia spp. so it is difficult to know if this function is used in other robo-thoria species. This game was inspired by the crop circles found all over the world. It is a puzzle-adventure game about a farmer trapped in corn mazes. This game is all about the mechanics and the mysteries of these crop circles. There are no monsters, no boss battles and no puzzle-to-be-solved. A true game for puzzle-adventure lovers. About the developer: This game was created by a fellow developer of a circle discovery game. The game was made for his own amusement but eventually found other players who are also interested in the game and that is when this project started. - GOODLUCK! MONSTER UNIVERSE Run through the darkest depths of the mysterious and dangerous depths of the sea. The deep, you must find out the answers of dark mysteries in the world that was closed off from us. Black skies, rusty iron, crumbling temples, dark forests, bloodthirsty horses. There is an ancient dream hidden in all these locations. Dive into the depths of the sea and find the answers of dark mysteries in MONSTER UNIVERSE. We love to play this kind of games. Because it gives us some reality still in this simulation. So we had the idea to make our own puzzle games, but different kind of puzzle that we wanted to play. And this is our first puzzle game. And we hope you like it.Q: Why would you recommend wrapping up variables in an IIFE? I was looking at some code when I found (function() { //variables }()); I don't really understand why you would want to do that. Is it just for reusability or is there something else you'd like to do? A: One thing that you may want to consider (if you are not already doing so) is to abstract away any calls you make to an external library. For example, if you were writing a code using knockout and wanted to call it from one function while you were writing another function, you could do something like: `var self = this; self.model = ko.mapping.fromJSON(model);` And then further down you could do: `self.model.getItems();` A: IIFEs are used where code is shared between any number of scopes. The main two use cases are the following: Sharing code that is only needed for the next iteration.
