Selective targeting of the VEGF receptor by monoclonal antibodies for radiation therapy. It is now well established that tumor angiogenesis may play a major role in metastasis and may represent an additional important target for tumor therapy. Approaches aimed at ablating the microvasculature have been a major focus of experimental and clinical studies involving a variety of strategies to target vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) receptors. Antibody-based strategies for targeting the VEGF receptor have shown promise and may provide a potential for new generation radiotherapy. The VEGF receptors are important regulatory molecules and the clinical development of anti-VEGF antibody-targeted radiotherapy has been limited by the high cost of the antibody, the low affinity of the antibodies used for radionuclide delivery and the absence of a means to measure and control the amount of antibody delivered. The development of small immunostimulatory ligands (e.g., 14-membered cyclic peptides) instead of monoclonal antibodies for targeting the VEGF receptor may provide a means to overcome these problems.
