It was clear right from the start that this was a film about revenge as a form of catharsis. The three films that followed pretty much all played by the rules of the genre. In the first, a man has been brain-washed into becoming a mass murderer and he seeks vengeance on the doctors and scientists that made him that way. In the second, an ordinary man seeks revenge after his daughter is raped and murdered. The third takes on this premise and adapts it to a female character. In each of the films, the revenge provided the vehicle to drive the plot forward and drive the protagonist into a more or less acceptable form of resolution. Death Wish was a comedy, as I've said before, and therefore, with a comedy comes the standard approach to depicting revenge, which is that the protagonist usually doesn't execute their plan. They come upon the situation in
