Square Enix Tarnished Prince Approved for Japanese Market.2009-07-03T00:00:00ZenIn Conflict

Have you heard about a series of controversial PlayStation games set to hit the Japanese market soon? If you haven't we'd like to point you toward the official teaser site as well as this blog post on tuxedoxen.org about the situation, which went up yesterday. Both are currently under fire for their stories, features, and the use of the "F" word. For the sake of full disclosure, as someone who's played some of the games, I understand both sides are justified in their concerns in a time of censorship. Unlikely as it seems, this game is supposed to be the legal alternative, but the media are blowing this whole situation completely out of proportion. Long story short, "Fate" is an event that occurs in this game's world, which ends up effecting all games that have any kind of elements similar to it. However, nobody seems to know what "Fate" is, or why it's important that its name be kept a secret. For that, the player is given a limited chance to try and reverse the Fates, but as the teaser says, it's really up to the player to decide what happens. But how is any of this relevant to gaming? How does this make the news? As I stated before, the "Fate" element is very important to the success of the game. Without a nonchalant and fake name like "Fate", the story, features, and gameplay you'd expect from a PS3 RPG would be considered horror fiction. The game also contains a lot of Japanese culture, specifically from Japanese mythology, including monsters and characters to symbolize the Phelan visits Elmira to see seniors Jim Phelan, a man with enough accolades to fill an encyclopedia, was passing through the Elmira-Corning Regional Airport Monday, and naturally we asked him about this new facility. On second thought, we asked him if there was any truth to the rumors we've heard for the last couple of weeks. Not really. Just kidding. Sort of. But obviously, it would be wonderful if this $16 million hangar project did pay off in roughly a few months. The project was approved unanimously last month and was sponsored by Assemblyman Dan Kavalick. "When we first began designing this, we contacted the FAA about how to bring it in, in an environmentally friendly manner," Phelan said. "We're in the process now of getting the railings for the building on the outside, so it's basically ready to go." It's a good that the project is on schedule, although Phelan did say there are a few hurdles. "The FAA has placed some safety regulations on us," Phelan said. "Our director is there and he has to sign off on the hangar. This is the last step. He has to give the OK for us to move on." Phelan is referring to FAA requirements that a building couldn't be larger than 75 feet deep, with 14,000 square feet of usable space, and that it be no taller than 60 feet. "The FAA will have to certify it," Phelan said. "That could take another four to six weeks."
