and magic. Use these items to develop your character. A few weeks ago, a French cyclist named Michael Aligondi raised eyebrows with a clever run to the Elite Men's Time Trial road race at the World Championships in Innsbruck. Arriving in eighth place, 50 seconds back from the pace setter, Aligondi took tenth, four spots back from the win. Aligondi's performance was good, but not spectacular, and when I tried to dig deeper to understand exactly what he did, I realized he wasn't unique. If you look at the UCI Men's Hour Record, you'll find a cluster of three riders entering the record book with very similar times. It would be wrong to assume that they are in some kind of position battle, but there is enough evidence in their positions alone to conclude they are in a group of similarly skilled riders. More telling, you will note that the three riders, Rafal Majka, Tim Wellens, and Paul Martens, have successfully run their own sub-2:00 hour mile bikes and will all enter the record books with speeds within 5 seconds of each other.
