The film comes from directors Vince Marcello and Richard Lynn, who mix cop interviews, flat animation, and scary sound effects to try to make sense of a homicide investigation in a rapidly gentrifying neighborhood. The film focuses on Detective Chris Hall (Ken Jeong), who’s working on his eighth summer in L.A.’s LAPD to make detective. He’s a dedicated professional who really likes his job. But this is a pretty boring movie, which could run out of steam around the time the characters start talking about the culture of the neighborhood. Maybe that’s what makes it resonate. Directed by Vince Marcello, “Killing Season” (Sundance, U.S. Documentary Audience Award, World Cinema Documentary Category) won the Grand Jury Prize at the Sundance Film Festival. It also received a special jury prize at last year’s Toronto International Film Festival. Even if you’re not a fan of the genre, you’ll probably enjoy “Killing Season” for the same reasons everyone seems to be enjoying it: It’s entertaining. “I appreciate that I’m getting to spend time with myself in a really creative, productive way,” Jeong says in an interview at the festival. “I’m able to be that role model for myself.” “I’m happy that this is happening,” Marcello said in a phone interview. “It means a lot. It means a lot of people are watching the film. We are not trying to change anything. We are just doing our jobs.” While it’s one thing to find a film that makes you laugh, it’s another thing to laugh
