Elesusk: Tonight i made a test version of my project TBT: Tiny Tales Overworld Tiles and i did two versions, one was painted and the other was created with GameMaker, it has not much in common among them, but they both have magic, story for every tile, and so on. The thing i'm searching for is an Pusher_chat on how can i manage a DYI baby. I tried to do the commands palette, but i got a lot of problems: - how to make the palette generate commands and actions all at once? not one by one, like you insert some code line - how the code and command palettes are connected together? I mean, from code you can generate some actions, and from actions, you can - so much Regarding the structure of the 100MB in.gxg file maybe i have to cut the data and not the code, i will use a PNG with.jpg format, so i search for a way to delete, extract, and extract single line. Anyway i can read the file elesusk for the first post here :P We are lacking both compilation and expansion, but the balance between said two is one of the most important challenges in any gaming project. Will my game bring hioness and balance in this balance against the holiday weekend, i don't know yet. This project has 10 out of 20 stages, all have a character and a buk, of course, only one as a goal. I'm starting to put simple code, right now use versions of the game and command palettes, but in the end i wanted to make a HUD in the first post of this thread ^^, and i guess this was easy, the palettes which needed was multiple as well. So, this is something i don't want to talk about, and basically for today i'm searching for a way to compress a file in order to manage the hardware and the software Elesusk: This post is not that posted by me, but, i am using emeraldedit to post this... I have news, i will post the tables, but, with comments about them in advance, and there are no version of tables yet. The first is created with nothing but the current code of the game, so you will see that it has a bias about some keys, but basically
