To assess the socio-economic profile of hospitalizations in elderly people in the city of Palmas, Tocantins, Brazil. This crosssectional study was conducted in the Tocantins state capital from September to December 2003, and comprised residents aged 60 or over from one public facilities where the elderly were hospitalized during 2003. A total of 130 elderly people who occupied the four selected public health facilities were interviewed, and the number of inpatients was counted for each health facility. The principal variables were income, age, gender and schooling of the respondents, which were obtained from the interviews, and hospitalization data were obtained from the health facility databases. The following variables were studied: number of hospitalizations, average number of beds occupied and total hospitalization costs. The analysis of the data showed a significant difference (p
