hyperparathyroidism: preoperative localization, staging, and surgical approach. The purpose of this study was to determine the accuracy of magnetic resonance (MR) imaging in localizing primary hyperparathyroidism (HPT), staging HPT, and guiding surgical approaches. The institutional review board approved this study. Thirty patients with asymptomatic primary HPT underwent preoperative MR imaging. Unenhanced T1-weighted, gadolinium-enhanced T1-weighted, three-dimensional gradient-recalled-echo, and T2-weighted axial images were obtained and reviewed. MR images were correlated with findings at operation and pathologic assessment of the parathyroid gland. The operative sites included the neck (n = 9), the mediastinum (n = 13), or the chest (n = 8). HPT was classified into 10 patients with stage 1, 14 with stage 2, and 6 with stage 3 disease. MR imaging correctly showed 11 of 11 parathyroid glands localized in the neck and mediastinum and

To evaluate the presence of human papillomavirus (HPV) DNA in airway papillomatosis biopsy specimens, to determine the prevalence of HPV-16 and HPV-18 in these lesions, and to compare the association of HPV detection with patient clinical features. Paraffin-embedded tissue from biopsy specimens of 48 consecutive patients with recurrent respiratory papillomatosis was analyzed for HPV DNA using the polymerase chain reaction (PCR). The PCR products were then digested with enzymes that distinguish HPV-16 and HPV-18, and the virus type detected was confirmed by DNA sequencing. Viral DNA was detected in 21 of 38 (55%) biopsy specimens (14 of 19 specimens from patients with the classic form of this disease and seven of 19 from those with the juvenile form). HPV-16 was found in 14 of 38 specimens (37%), HPV-18 in two of 38 (5%), and both HPV-16 and HPV-18 were found in one specimen (2%). Combined HPV-16 and HPV-18 infections were found in 10 of 38 (26%). The prevalence of HPV infection in the samples was significantly greater in the juvenile form of the disease than in the classic form ($P = .01$), but there was no difference in the prevalence of HPV-16 in the classic and juvenile forms of the disease. The results of this study indicate that HPV is present in most patients with recurrent respiratory papillomatosis, and that HPV
