The cracke and direct download link for noteburner m4v converter plus 2.1 crack Crack is.Q: Makefile included from a bash script For my makefile I have stuff: @include "stuff" But if I want to include the same makefile from another bash script, I do . . . source include/make.sh ... How would I get make to recognize the include statements? Thanks A: Your question isn't entirely clear, but I think you're asking about this: In the following example (not tested), make reads the makefile in the current directory. $ cat ~/doc.txt include /home/joe/doc.txt $ $ make include: ~/doc.txt: No such file or directory include: No such file or directory If I don't specify a makefile, make looks for one in the current directory, which is why I see the Makefile: No such file or directory. If I change the makefile to be located somewhere else, like ~/doc.txt: $ cat ~/doc.txt include /home/joe/doc.txt $ make include: /home/joe/doc.txt: No such file or directory include: No such file or directory $ make -f ~/doc.txt makefile: /home/joe/doc.txt: No such file or directory include: /home/joe/doc.txt: No such file or directory Make looks for the file in the directory where the makefile is located. The easiest way to make this work is to add absolute paths to your include statements. I assume it's because the Makefile is located in a subdirectory that make doesn't find it. If I do this: $ cat ~/doc.txt include ~/doc.txt $ $ make include: /home/joe/doc.txt: No such file or directory include: No such file or directory
