What are all the things that the reviewers can reject my app for? A: 1) Missing requirements in the Info.plist file: the first item in the file is "Required device capabilities" which contains a list of key-value pairs for key-value pairs that the app has declared that it requires. Here's a good overview 2) Missing an icon, showing on the top bar: once again, your app needs to declare it's need for an icon in the same way as above. Again, there's a good overview of this 3) Badging:

apple will reject any app that uses its own "badges" on the top bar. There's a good overview of this 4) Missing a privacy policy: quite easy to get this wrong - look into the "Privacy and Legal" section in the Information and Style Guide 5) TestFlight: any app that has been submitted to the app store for release will be rejected if it has been submitted to testers and isn't "working". i.e. you're using the app store to test it in a similar way that users are likely to - ie d41b202975

Stratfor is a private, for-profit organization specializing in geopolitical analysis. Founded in 1996, it is privately owned and funded by its founder and executive chairman, George Friedman, a former diplomat and writer for the New York Times. Unlike traditional research groups, Stratfor analyzes data in a different way, focusing on the geopolitical implications of information. Stratfor uses rigorous and original analytic methods, and, according to its authors, does not simply regurgitate data, but instead aims to clarify underlying trends and issues. Stratfor describes its analysis as "geopolitical forecasting," a business application of mathematics and statistical analysis. According to Friedman, this methodology has proven to be very accurate in the past. Most of Stratfor's staff are corporate veterans, and they tend to work closely with the company's information providers, generally governments or intelligence agencies. The service receives government and corporate contracts, and its staff are permitted to share in the company's profits. The company's principal office is in Austin, Texas. The firm's name is derived from the Greek words στρατηγός (strategos), meaning "general" or "commander," and σύνταξη (syntaxis), meaning "recollection" or "organization." Stratfor is both a registered trademark and an acronym. About 50% of the subscribers are located in the US, and about 30% in the UK, Japan and Canada. The service is particularly strong in the area of international business, in particular in the Asia-Pacific region. Although Stratfor has had a number of articles on the most relevant issues of the day published in the New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, the San Francisco Chronicle and other major publications, it is still a very small operation. It is notable that the company does not claim to possess inside information on the intentions of governments or corporations, but instead claims that it only uses publicly available information. We often come across companies that are building awesome prototypes for a new way of handling payments, and wonder how they'll be able to compete in the real world. We think that there are very important benefits of having mobile, instant, anonymous, and completely free payments, and think it's just a matter of time until they become a reality. After all, SMS messaging is now a fact of life, and the only thing people have to make it a reality is a working cell phone

What's new:

Author: Don D. Larson, Ph.D. In a normal war, the combatants either attack the enemy or defend their own territory, places, and homes from the enemy. In the atomic age, however, the threat or destruction can be from beyond “our” planet. Were the fears of a nuclear war to be realized, the devastation could be catastrophic, affecting all life on earth. In Europe, the “horse and buggy” planes of World War I devoured the nations of the king, emperor, and government. Thousands of young officers and men were sacrificed and the countryside devastated beyond any peacetime remembrance. No wonder the president of the United States developed a saw for war. This saw would consume many projected violence scenarios. In 1954, when Eisenhower was president, he developed a “strange weapon” and it received the moniker “atom bomb.” The weapon consisted of simply moving the country to the same as all came to realize it was better to live under the “fear of the sword” than under the “fear of the sword plus the sword of a bad neighbor.” From that time until now, the US. has continued to try to come up with an effective long-range surface-to-surface weapon. Late in 1954, the United States published an extensive monograph about the future deployment and use of the hydrogen bomb. The military history book, entitled “Sketch of a Plan” printed in The Connecticut Bulletin, 8

February 1955, provided an overview of the US.'s future strategic nuclear weapons placement. The monograph was produced by the staff of the US. Atomic Energy Commission, from 1957 to 1969, at the request of the National Security Council, and was one in a series of briefing monographs produced by the NSC staff under direct supervision of the NSC Joint Strategic Capability Plan. The monograph was important for both our present day description and understanding the massive nuclear weapons expenditure of the US. In essence, the monograph acknowledged that the "nuclear weapons would provide the United States with the capability to carry out a limited attack against a military establishment to which the United States could hardly hope to prevail." The nature of the weapons and the capability to deliver them could not be ignored, however. According to the atomic energy head in the monograph, "Were we to attack another Soviet Union, for example, we would be primarily concerned with destroying our
