Oxtoby Chimica Moderna Pdf.Photo Credit: Courtesy of CWA In this season of peak television, it's easy to forget that, even within this small universe, some shows are actually built around a live audience, with live audience members engaged in active participation. This is why The View was so easy to love, why The Talk is still stand-out, and why Crazy Ex-Girlfriend and The Good Place have more in common than their perfectly manicured plots and smart leading ladies would have you believe. Whereas The View forced its audience to remember how wrong they could be in real-life, and The Talk shamelessly used its (very big) audience as a playground for its daily soap opera, both Crazy Ex-Girlfriend and The Good Place have skipped the stage of passive listening and moved straight into the stage of active participation — audiences — from which some of the most interesting television has always been made. The Good Place rests squarely in the overachieving category of shows: because the premise that “you get to choose” is rarely as simple as it sounds. What it ultimately decides to be is what matters. At the start of its run, The Good Place was giving “good” a bad name (pun intended) as a catch-all explanation for why, post-showdown, people were still alive. But when Michael comes back from the afterlife, it's clear that what makes him “good” is his compassion, not the number of good things he's done. The audience doesn't need a description to realize what it did; they're simply required to do it in real life. But it's also Michael who unknowingly decides who doesn't make the cut, by exposing their lies, and then, every week, the audience does. The ongoing joke of the show, set up right from the start (when Michael brings everyone out of hell and tries to help the first woman he meets), is that, as a result of Michael's character flaws
