attached to a pair of nuts which are to be applied to the cable and pulled there-across so that they tighten around the cable and clamp it firmly. For reasons of safety and speed, no attempt is made to move the nuts tightly on to the cable. In practice, this is done by grasping the cable between the two nuts and then attempting to twist the nuts together using a pair of pliers. It may even be necessary to use a lever to assist in the twisting. This approach to cable termination in practice entails the risk of an accidental backward movement of the cable as the nuts are being tightened up, i.e. the cable may not always be sufficiently well fixed in place. Cable termination has conventionally been effected by means of the use of a so-called "cable tie". This is comprised of a length of flexible material, such as rubber, which is folded into a strip-like cross-section, and secured at each end by means of a screw. This is placed around the cable and the ends of the tie are then screwed into place. In practice, it is often necessary to ensure that the cable tie can be applied securely to the cable and that it cannot slip off down the cable. This has conventionally been achieved by using adhesive to attach the rubber to the cable. In practice, this often involves the complete immersion of the rubber in the adhesive, which is then dried over a period of time. This is then followed by the application of either a permanent or removable adhesive to the rubber. A further method of cable termination involves the use of so-called double terminated strain relief boots. This consists of a boot with a split in it and two strain relief bushings which are screwed into place over the cable's sheath. These latter techniques suffer from the disadvantage of requiring a tool (that is, the screwdriver) which must be used in a predetermined sequence and then carefully removed. Although this is not a problem at the time of manufacture of the cable ties, it does mean that they cannot be
