According to ICE, from the start of 2008 until May, more than 38,000 criminal aliens had been arrested and deported, while another 25,000 were still being sought. "I think, in a lot of cases, ICE has been selective in its enforcement," said Chad Readler, who heads the agency's Office of Immigration Litigation. "They have resources, and they have priorities." Readler suggested that the fugitive justice system has been thrown into disarray due to conflicting enforcement policies and priorities created by the Obama Administration. President Obama's "Families First" Executive Order of June 16, 2012, required enforcement of all federal immigration law and prioritized the removal of violent and "public safety" threats among illegal aliens. "Since that time, Mr. Obama has further taken steps to disregard the law," said ICE's Readler. "Prior to President Obama's 2011 decision to no longer honor ICE's detainees, the agency made more than 300,000 detainees for enforcement purposes. Since then, the number has plummeted to fewer than 13,000, making ICE's ability to locate and arrest immigration violators even more critical to protecting the public." Readler noted that ICE has deported more criminal aliens under the Obama Administration's "Families First" policy than the number of criminal aliens arrested at the end of 2005, which is about 275,000. In February, the House Judiciary Committee released a report, which stated that ICE deported more criminal aliens from 2008 to 2011 than the last nine presidents combined. "The numbers do not lie," said Steve Camarota, director of research for the Center for Immigration Studies. "The Obama administration is not only removing more criminal aliens than any other administration in recent history b7e8fd5c8
