Some years ago a guy named Evan once made a graphics library called SDL_gfx. I've always had a thing for making games in C++, so this immediately appealed to me, and I've been using it in a variety of different projects ever since. Recently, I wrote a very simple 2D game engine called DarKnot that has been updated to use SDL_gfx rather than SDL_ttf for pretty much all of it's drawing. I've decided to release this under an open source license and put the project online. If you have any interest in making games in C++ then I think you'll find this library quite useful. There are of course some issues with the engine, but they aren't anything serious. I'd love to hear what you think of the project and what you want to see me do in the future. Here are the important files: The main code is in src/main.cpp I was very ambitious when writing this and had intended on making a single statically linked executable that could run everywhere. I'm now realizing that this is likely a lot of work and maybe a bit daunting, so I've elected to focus on making a platform-agnostic library. This means that the code will need to be linked into any library, but it should be a fairly simple matter to do so. You can read more about my reasoning here. If you want to actually run the game you need a toolchain that has been built with the SDL_gfx library. I have written a script that will do this for you. You can use it to build and run the game. The core of the game's code is in src/dar.cpp and src/darlib.h The code I wrote in src/dar.cpp and src/darlib.h The engine is designed to be "multi-threaded" in the sense that if you are using `SDL_gfx` then you can easily queue drawing operations to the hardware as they come in. However, if you are running an older version of SDL then you need to manually queue them yourself in order to get the performance you'd expect. The engine doesn't really do anything to force this "automation" of queuing, but if you want to be totally safe you might need to manually start and stop your threads yourself. This may be a bit of a hassle, and I'm definitely planning to improve this. You can read more about how it works here.
