What's new:

Saturday, January 11, 2013 I came across a family of three di'alogues in the eleventh c. LXX: the Talmudic scholars Shmuel, Samuel and Joshua. As this was the first name that I was familiar with in this book, I decided to jot down some words about each of them. Expect a whole lot of things to just pop into this. I will refrain from simply quoting from a Talmud: it is bound to make my eyes glaze over. Shmuel is the youngest of the three. 'The name Shmuel is very kind, and it is not at all unusual for one on the right path to have that name.' Ibn Janah, Haggah Mishpatim Sefer III:3 He is an eminent sages considered by many kabbalists to be the most important of all the Talmudic authors, although he was very reluctant to work with the many sayanim. He is the author of five volumes of Halakhah and many source books; none of his works treat of the essence of the Torah. In light of the severity of his ideas, those who wish that he was the founder of the scientific interpretation of Halakhah, one might say that he was the first Gnostic rabbi. However, it was Yosi Anan, the author of Babli, who in the twelve years prior to the third ecdste that had a more popular influence on the mainstream of Rabbinic thought in Europe. When he was a young man, the sages of the Gaon of Vilna had hypnotized him. “I saw your previous work, and I saw that it was surpassing the works of all the other rabbis. I had a burning desire to study with you,” he told them, and there began his long service with that one among the sages. It is now approximately 4112 when he departs this life. For those of us not well versed in dates and other such tidbits, that’s about thirty years less than the middle age of Jacob ben Lecher and more than ten years younger than the Gaon of Vilna. One might say that it is he who is the true founder of the Babylonian school of Cabalistic Judaism. Rather than the exodus from Egypt, it is the exodus from Egypt that has been his defining event in Judaism. Many of his bizarre ideas stem from that time. Much of what
