Tlön: Unlimited Utopia in Computation and Power is a surreal cyberpunk RPG set in a far future dystopia. • Invent your own tools, trains, and machines by combining industry and science. • Suit your play style with 8 classes and 11 racial skills. • Join the Frontiers campaign and solve deep mysteries. • Unearth the dark secrets of the Tlön Corporation, as told through their own eyes in the Mundus inquisitorum videogame. Tlön: Unlimited Utopia in Computation and Power offers an open world strategy experience and is completely non-linear. It explores the setting through extensive story sequences, while the player may ignore or opt-into parts of the plot at any time. Set in a far future dystopia, Tlön: Unlimited Utopia in Computation and Power tells the story of Foth, a Mundi Magus who wakes up from a strange and difficult past in a Corporation-controlled world where people are "reprogrammed" into new bodies upon death. With no memory of his past and an affinity for machines, Foth searches for his place in the world. The player will take on the role of Foth, a Mundi Magus who has awoken from a strange and difficult past in a Corporation-controlled world. In an attempt to rebuild his life, the player will have to unravel the Corporation's dark secrets. An open-world, cyberpunk, roleplaying game is with a focus on narrative. The player will be able to explore the world in any direction at any time, but in order to solve major mysteries the player will have to complete certain tasks, progress the story and make choices that deeply impact the world. What's new:

When I listen to this (and I listen to it a lot), I picture (or imagine) and scenario going like this: A sudden influx of fairies exists within a one dimensional line of childhood liminal experience. Five year olds feature in the presentation. Oliver is suspended for a time in their realm. He experiences the wonders of a world of fairies and he encounters an elderly elf. The children go and fetch a police man who interrogates the elf and his group – once the edge is approached. The wonderful thing about this, and perhaps the most unusual aspect, is that it was a collective fantasy. This was fantasy story, in the form of a TV play, that was collectively produced by a group of Welsh and English television professionals and writers. I wrote the text for this play at the time and gave my bit to fit in. The scenario follows. The Fairyworld, Part One The panellists and guests were Whittington Ellis-Davies, Walter Wager, Bill Leak, Bill Sheppard, Timothy Davies. The entertainer in this case was Alan Coates. The children arrived, with some adults who carried their picture round the BBC news studio. The five year old version of the four children was of a muscular character, with a face and ears like a monkey. He had been cast in this role because his movements had been so expressionless and lacking in confidence. Now I have made a demonstration tape of him, and this is how he moves. One, two three and four will tell you they have been in the park at Melton Mowbray, on a delightful day in the summertime. This sketch is reminiscent of a Play for Today – and indeed this was. One young girl starts off. She had a huge gap between her two front teeth and this reveals a slight strain of the yokel, local and unhurt – as so much folk art is meant to be – in the usually hearty English landscape. She vividly likens the fairies to faeries, a term one quickly sees used as part of the front for a more pantomime witch nonsense. Second, the oldest boy says the fairies gave him four very interesting presents. First was an electric pencil sharpener. Third, the girl next to him says the fairies gave her a lift home. Fourth and finally, the youngest boy explains the strange thing they did to him, and he describes the event
