A Critical View on the Clean Development Mechanism by Reem Mestari

The Clean Development Mechanism (CDM), as a third-party certification scheme of its type in the world, has been operated by United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) since the 80s. The objective of the CDM is to enhance the environment through incentive-based projects in developing countries in order to drive positive emission reduction, i.e. avoided carbon dioxide (CO₂) emissions. The international community has a great need of any projects reducing greenhouse gas emissions – especially with the effects of climate change – to avoid it to become an un-manageable problem. The CDM has been associated with the UNEP as a result of its wide application around the world, mainly in developing countries. The CDM is an emission trading scheme (ETS) for offsetting carbon emissions produced by projects that reduce greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions through activities like the reforestation of deforested lands, the planting of trees and the enhancement of soil quality. Therefore, it means payment is made to a project based on the emissions from the project and the guarantee of emissions reductions, which is made to the project. As explained above, this is a mechanism for economic growth through the enhancement of the environment, hence its title. Based on the objective of the CDM, there are no limits of the amount of emission reductions on a project to be paid, which means that projects can be funded for as long as they show positive emissions reductions. The CDM is an important component of the World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD) agenda and it has been growing in recent years. At the WSSD, the Kyoto Protocol – which is an international agreement for reducing emissions – was launched in 1997. The CDM was in place for the first time in a January 1995 meeting in Bonn, which was a follow-up to the UN Conference on the Environment and Development (UNCED) from June 3-14, 1992. (See: UNFCCC and CDM Structure.) The CDM began to operate from 1995 onwards. The Agreement was made between the World Trade Organization (WTO) and the UNEP in June 1995 with the participation of both the UN and the private sector. (See: Agreement Between the UNEP and the WTO.) Although the UNEP was established by the United Nations General Assembly in
