Effects of acute and chronic exposure to cigarette smoke on pulmonary function and responses in adult mice. Chronic tobacco smoking is one of the most important risk factors in the development and progression of chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. These effects have been observed at very low levels of exposure that have not been possible to study previously. The aim of this study was to compare the effects of acute (6 h) versus chronic (16 weeks) exposure to cigarette smoke (CS) on pulmonary function, bronchoalveolar lavage (BAL) cell profiles, and BAL inflammatory mediators in mice. Forty-two male mice were randomized to either exposure to CS or air. The acute exposure model consisted of CS exposure for 6 h per day for 5 days, whereas the chronic exposure model consisted of CS exposure for 6 h per day for 5 days, whereas the chronic exposure model consisted of CS exposure for 6 h per day, 5 days per week for 16 weeks.

The acute exposure model significantly increased the BAL fluid protein concentration (p d0c515b9f4)
