If a newcomer to a team has a bad attitude in the beginning, then the chances are, he will maintain it throughout the career. This leads to the outsiders that have to be removed from the team and are a bane to your team performances, but the truth is that sometimes an outsider is more valuable than the insider because he represents the team in its totality. When I started riding, I was pretty much an insider. I was part of the agasian Club – a small club with mainly PG riders and a few PK from other clubs. The team ethos was that you could only come from within – otherwise you are too dumb to survive to tell you the truth. If you were going to stick with the team, then you had to adapt. You had to learn the rules and the system, otherwise you would be asked to leave. Pretty simple. You could make an exception to this rule, if you were the right you. Of course, this rule did not apply to all members. We had some insiders and some outsiders would stick it out for years, then when the club decided to change everything, they would up and leave the team and switch to the other team. The insiders, on the other hand, would have the attitude that they can get anywhere they want because they are insiders. At any given time, you always have the super insiders and the outsiders. What I realized early on was that I was a super insider, I could skate with anybody from the team. If I was playing a disc, then I had the ability to go all-out and win the game on my own. I was highly motivated, I always gave 110% to the team, I listened to my coaches, and I treated my teammates with respect. I then realized earl occurred that knowledge with me. I could
