Importance of analysis of enzyme activity toward radioactive beta-glucuronide in glucuronide conjugation studies. When the enzymes involved in glucuronidation of sulphadiazine and phenacetin were studied, it was found that the activity of UDP-glucuronosyltransferase toward beta-glucuronide (UDP-G) was much less than that toward sulphate (SO_4^{2-}) or glucuronic acid (GlcUA) in rat and rabbit liver and in human and rat hepatoma cells, respectively. The true glucuronide content in hepatic and extrahepatic bile also showed much less UDP-G than glucuronic acid and sulphate. However, glucuronide determined after the addition of beta-glucuronidase to incubation mixtures showed much more UDP-G than glucuronic acid and sulphate. The conclusion was that a considerable part of UDP-G was converted into glucuronic acid and sulphate and remained a non-conjugated substrate. This was further supported by the results of glucuronidase treatment of the metabolite formed in rat liver microsomes. Thus, incorrect estimation of glucuronides in microsomes may result in a large underestimation of UDP-G formation. In human liver microsomes, a similar result was obtained from UDP-G formation in the presence of three drugs with varying degrees of glucuronidation.
