This is the first time I've actually had a technical question and I want some ideas of how to go about it. I work for a printing company and we are trying to automate some of our more routine tasks using C#. One of the more tedious tasks we have is to automatically enter events into our database (CVS1) for each object we use on each job. There are 2 issues with this. 1) Generally it would be a lot easier if we could access the system via the web rather than running queries from a client's server 2) This client's server is on premises and it isn't going to make sense to share their server with me. In other words, it looks like it might be an idea to install a copy of VS and SQL on our server and have the client access it from there. Is this a viable option? And if so, how can we do it? Thanks in advance.
