Recently, in the surgical technique of a patient suffering from a serious illness or the like, the development of a surgical technique has been advanced, in which an organ of the patient is separated from the surrounding tissues and the separated organ is temporarily supported by a surgical clamp using the vascular technique or reattached to the surrounding tissues. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,593,095 discloses a method of temporarily supporting and fixing a whole organ, comprising steps of introducing a fluid from an external source to the organ, and suctioning air from the organ. In this case, after a tissue including a vascular network is sucked and clamped, a surgery is performed by using the whole organ as a working site of the surgery. In addition, the organ may be lifted and clamped to provide a counter clamping to protect the tissue from the surgery. However, such clamping requires precise handling to efficiently operate and to reduce the operation time. The clamp should be freely removed from the position on the organ, and the precise operation such as blood flow clamp should be performed at the right position. In particular, the clamp should be easily and precisely handled at a clamping time, and may be easily removed and a surgery may be performed by lifting the clamped organ. In addition, the organ should be clamped firmly, and the quality of the surgery should be maintained. Generally, in the clamping method, a clamp has a metal bar shape having a bar length and a distal and proximal ends. For clamping the tissue, the distal end of the clamp is inserted into a patient's body, the clamp is horizontally and vertically adjusted to lift the tissue, and the tissue is clamped while the tissue is partially suctioned. The surgery is performed by separating the clamped tissue from a remnant tissue. However, a clamping method of a conventional clamp has a disadvantage in that the clamp is inserted in the patient's body, thus resulting in a large lesion. In addition, there are problems in that the clamp is horizontally moved in the patient's body and a depth of the clamp insertion is limited to a certain depth, and the clamp should be frequently moved within a limited range in the tissue.[Measuring benzene in air, in drinking water and in blood]. The goals of the study were to develop and validate a method for measuring benzene in air and to demonstrate its use in routine measurement. A modified method of trapping benzene in liquid membranes
