Knowing the three-dimensional sub-cellular architecture of a cell is essential for understanding and interpreting the role of cell shape and cytoskeletal architecture in the generation of force, modulating protein activity, and directing cell motility. The ability to quantify the cytoskeletal architecture, such as cytoskeletal tension in individual cells, as a function of space and time, would greatly facilitate our understanding of the role of shape and stress in signaling pathways, the molecular composition of the cytoskeleton, and the mechanism by which cells establish and maintain a particular shape and to what extent shape can be imposed. To this end we propose a new instrument design to examine the cellular cytoskeleton with immunocytochemistry, image-based fluorescence microscopy, and optical tweezers. To apply our technique for live cell imaging, we propose the production of a device capable of simultaneously measuring the shape, geometry, and relative sub-cellular tension of cell sheets.
