Correlative changes in brain morphology and neurophysiology are known to occur during normal brain development. A knowledge of the typical pattern of maturational change can help in understanding specific disease processes. Accurate and precise measurements of the brain are of much interest in neurosurgery and brain morphometry. The segmentation of the neonatal brain is a first step towards such quantification. We have therefore used the Interactive Level Set Segmentation technique to perform a semi-automatic segmentation of the infant and child brain in high resolution, T1-weighted, magnetic resonance (MR) images. Our algorithm is based on a two-step approach, i.e. the segmentation of the outer surface, including the sulci and gyri of the brain, followed by the assignment of the grey/white matter boundary within the segmented brain. The algorithm combines an intensity-based initial segmentation with a fuzzy modelling approach that uses image grey level information and a vector-field-based approach to refine the segmentation. The MR images of 10 infants and 10 children ranging in age from 2 to 5 years were used in this study. The average duration of the segmentation was 12.46 s (SD = 5.55). A method for the automatic segmentation of structures in the brain is important for morphometric studies. The semi-automatic segmentation technique presented here has shown to be a useful approach for this task.(CNN) A failed Syrian airstrike has killed seven civilians in western Syria, including four children, the UK-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights reported Sunday.
