What's new:

y Weather Fuels the Flames of Grief For nearly two weeks now, we have been gripped by a summertime storm rage: a series of record-breaking heatwaves, the highest daily temperatures on record for the country, and a series of blizzards off the West Coast. Meanwhile, in Finland, we have experienced 70 years of record-high temperatures, and last month saw all-time-record-breaking heat in at least 17 European countries. Across all of Europe, the average temperature is now 3°C above the 1961 to 1990 baseline, currently surpassing the previous 2007 record-holder. In Darwin, Australia — where we spent the month of March — the average temperature in March was 4°C higher than the 1961 to 1990 average, and in some local areas, unprecedented levels of rainfall were recorded. Advertisement With such extreme weather conditions on our doorstep, it isn’t surprising that we’ve been swept up in a wave of grief. In the past, it was predominantly those of us in the wealthier and more heat-constrained countries such as Europe and North America, that felt the effects of climate change most acutely. A 2009 social media meme that went viral, bore the question, “who is going to care for us in Australia when all the farmers die?” Facial expressions cannot depict many human emotions, but they tell a great deal about them. Importantly, in the cases of weather-induced grief, people who have spent the day despairing over being too hot, staring at the screen, or even at each other’s glances of disbelief at extreme temperatures, and people who have spent the day in joyous revelry together at extreme warmth, cannot help but to hold back the simplest facial expression of sadness for a loved one. The weather has imitated what we have been experiencing at home — hot, dry, and windy; for much of that time, all we have had to shield ourselves from the heat were the closed or sealed windows, and dry packing among the towels. No wonder many of us are tired of the heat. “In the next few years in developing countries, population is going to increase much more in the tropical areas,” notes climate change scientist Craig Hazell, who has been working in Kenya since 2006. “That means we are going to have to adapt to longer, hotter days. We already know that the hot midday sun itself is worse in the tropics. In Australia,
