*Best Game Design @ the contest "The 26th Develop Awards" *Best Indie @ the contest "The 40th Serious Game Awards" *Best Short Game @ the contest "The 24th Serious Game Awards" This is a cyberpunk first-person-shooter with a S-tier story, created in the Unreal Engine. You play as a former undercover cop, who returns after being brainwashed, to his old job in the criminal underworld. The action takes place in a city full of broken and decaying cars, unknown manmade structures, and a place where humans are not so easy to trust. A Hard & Hardcore Sci-Fi Shooter in a linear, single-player campaign. The game features a lot of shooting, lots of story, and loads of firearms. The forces of the wasteland are trying to destroy our home. These ones were defeated, but there are plenty of others, waiting to start over with you as their prey. This is my first game that I really developed myself and I have learned a lot with it. I'm very proud of this game. It's not the only game I'll make, but it's what I consider to be my best so far. A small sci-fi horror, inspired by Tim Burton's early work. You are trapped on an abandoned space station, by yourself, and trapped in a little room. It's not a very big one, but the space station is just right in size to house a cosmonaut with you, in his lonely final moment... This is a space RPG, reminiscent of Daedalic's "The Long Journey Home" or "Dreamfall", with a little bit of a side of Divinity. It's a sci-fi, big and quite beautiful, with many characters and dialogues. You can play as a regular person, a hooded person, or even a "bad guy" "In this game you're a fish. What's that?" "Fish is an aquatic animal" "Oh, ok." "Now take this hammer and smash everything. All the boxes, windows, and furniture. Nothing matters." This is a side-scrolling survival horror game, set in a beautifully crafted world designed by the legendary designer Tim Schafer (Broken Sword, Day of the Tentacle, Grim F

What's new:

took heavy action last week. The last week in October brings a whole new meaning to the vicious “month of the monkey”. The chattering classes around the globe have been covering SPACE ALPHA with a red-hot mix of intrigue, debate, speculation and gossip that is almost embarrassing. Let’s get this out of the way now: this newsletter is being written several hours after the crash. We do not know yet the conditions and science data pertaining to the disastrous September 28th mission. It is the responsibility of NASA and ESA to dictate the slow pace of information release as opposed to the media putting its own spin on things before NASA’s official data is released. Knowing NASA today, their protocols will make the limited data released sometime over the next week more complete and detailed than one of their previous missions that produced a brief media release. And we just can’t trust NASA in matters of public relations. So what we do know from NASA’s reactions as well as the press release is that a comet impacted a Russian spacecraft before travelling into a populated Soviet region. We also have NASA’s admission that the spacecraft ran out of fuel before reaching it’s low Mars orbit (about 950km) and impacting the planet. Based on these facts SpaceAlpha’s analysis takes into account that the spacecraft landed in an extremely cold place and the computer should be sending up all the temperature readings to Earth. Perhaps with the help of several robotic landers our computers in the year 2020 will be able to remotely determine what the temperature is at a given point on the comet. Of course, that is a bit of a stretch. NASA admits the toxic gas hazard from the Russian craft was yet another significant problem for the USOS Polar Mapping mission. Besides being unable to deal with the toxic powder, the vehicle, which was tilted and moving sideways, was prohibited from landing in one place. Now it’s impossible to control a storm on its tail so landing the craft was out of the question. The craft’s orbits in a very unstable path and there wasn’t enough fuel to correct the error. NASA is owning up to the fact that this mission could have easily been called off before it went sideways and crashed into Siberia. The simple fact is that this was much too close for comfort. With all that said, how did
